The present invention relates to the field of gas turbine engines and, more particularly, to those having a hot section with integral outer rings. In a gas turbine engine, a number of turbine blades are attached to an outer ring by way of complex dovetail type connections. The blade and ring dovetail connections each contain one or more mating dovetail grooves and are designed to fit snugly together and form a leak proof seal therebetween. The top of each dovetail groove is open in the direction of flow through the dovetail connection and provides a counteracting force which keeps the blade and ring from turning relative to one another during operation. Each dovetail groove also includes a dovetail groove counterbore to receive an insert which acts as a secondary seal around the blade outer air seal. In the past, blades have been cast and then attached to the outer ring by welding the blade to the outer ring with or without the use of an interface material such as an impregnated adhesive. The process has been carried out using the outer ring as a welding mandrel. Such a process results in complex structures which include a plurality of partially formed, non-coherent blade and ring dovetail connections. These dovetail connections have irregular surfaces and cannot be polished to an acceptable quality. Furthermore, after the blade has been welded to the ring, the blade becomes an integral part of the outer ring. In a variation of the above process, a plurality of dovetail grooves are cut in the outer ring. A blade is then placed into each cut out groove and a weld is performed in the dovetail groove to attach the blade to the ring. Again, this process results in complex structures which include a plurality of non-coherent dovetail grooves. Furthermore, the dovetail grooves are irregular in shape so that they cannot be polished to a quality acceptable in a gas turbine engine. Furthermore, after the blade has been welded to the outer ring, the blade becomes an integral part of the outer ring. In the past, it has also been proposed 4bc0debe42
