It takes a long time for it to complete (3-5 minutes). I have moved this project from one machine to another and my program runs fine on the same machine but not on the new machine. It runs very slow. I used reflector to debug the code and found that the machine on which it runs very slow has too many instances of the same (albeit different) class. Each instance of the class does a lot of mathematical operations (e.g. it contains a lot of if statement to check the value of the variables that comes into the class). The number of instances of the class is significantly more than the number of variables the class contains. I would like to know if there is a way to make the program run faster. I tried running it in multiple instances of VS, but it doesn't work. Please let me know what I can do to make it faster. Thanks. A: You'll need to do some careful investigation to find out how much overhead is associated with creating and destructing your classes. It is quite likely that the overhead is significantly less than your 3-5 minutes but you may not be able to tell without profiling. What you can do however is to use the static methods in the System.Array class to quickly convert arrays of numbers to floating point numbers and vice versa. Likewise, you may be able to use some of the methods in System.Math to quickly multiply numbers. And finally, do you need to perform all these mathematical calculations on every single item in a large number of collections? If so, you can employ LINQ to make this work very efficiently: // Given a Collection of unknown size, calculate the sum long Sum = collection.Sum(); // Given a Collection of unknown size, calculate the average double Avg = collection.Average(); ...and so on. These methods return the correct type of result so you don't need to cast,
