The former British lawmaker and Labour Party member of parliament will work on extremism and counter-extremism at the newly created office for countering extremism. Rowling will become an adviser on extremism and terrorism in the office established last year. "I have the honour of serving on the government's task force on countering extremism," said Rowling, adding that the new office would help her bring "the wizarding world's most feared enemy" to justice. "I am very grateful to David Cameron and Theresa May for giving me this opportunity," she said. Rowling joins a team of experts including former British military intelligence officials. But the office will face questions about how effective its strategy can be amid a backlash from Muslim groups. Last month Islamic State claimed responsibility for a murderous rampage in France which left 17 people dead and has since called on its followers to mount attacks across Europe. Rowling also quit the advisory role on the government's Prevent strategy, which aims to stop people being radicalised and has been criticised as counter-productive and insulting. Rowling, author of the "Harry Potter" series of children's books, was appointed an adviser on the government's task force on countering extremism in September. Her appointment was seen by some as a way of deflecting criticism that the government was associating with radical Islam, and giving prestige to the task force. Rowling did not serve in parliament or at any other government level, but has been a government adviser on a range of issues, including the economy, education, employment and tax.
